What is REALLY childish is your continued name-calling, and refusal to observe elementary courtesy. A "good faith" meet and confer requires that you do it in "good faith", i.e., identify just what it is that you find deficient.

That would enable us to focus on the issues (if any), and if necessary, consult with the client(s) and respond appropriately. But you specialize in name-calling, and seem incapable of communicating without threats; we're still trying to figure out whether that accomplishes anything other than wasting our time. If you desire to comply with the Federal Rules, I suggest you begin with a simple, polite letter detailing just what you consider deficient.

That's what we intend doing with Defendants' responses. You can, of course, assume whatever you want and do whatever you wish.

Yours truly,
K. Chittur, Esq.
